Edouard Manet Paintings

As an impressionist artist, Manet's predominantly consisted of Parisian life. Female nudes were often the subjects of Manet and many a time caused much controversy. What set Manet apart from his contemporaries was that he had a unique style of painting. He also did not attend any impressionist exhibitions in Paris. Manet preferred to capture everyday life and common objects in his paintings. The cafes and bars of Paris, the city and urban life, the street, and its people; beggars, singers, workers, were common in Manet's paintings. His brush strokes were loose and therefore some parts of the canvas were not properly covered, which made the critics comment on his work that it looks unfinished. Some of Manet's famous paintings include: Luncheon in the Studio, Concert in the Tuileries Gardens, A Bar at the Folies-Bergere, Portrait of Berthe Morisot, Concert in the Tuileries Gardens and Roadmenders in the Rue de Berne.

Camille Pissarro Paintings

When many of his contemporaries of the impressionist era refused to showcase their work at exhibitions, Camille Pissarro was the only one who had exhibited his paintings in all eight Impressionist exhibitions. His canvas captured the daily life of a peasant in Paris. Pissarro's work mainly focused on the effects of light on color. He was heavily influenced by politics and one cannot separate politics from his art. His paintings on the labor peasants is a clear example of this. Rural subjects were his favorite and painted them in vibrant compositions. Two Women Chatting by the Sea, St. Thomas, The Banks of the Oise near Pontoise, Jalais Hill, Pointoise, The Boulevard Montmartre on a Winter Morning, Road to Versailles at Louveciennes are the most notable works of Camille Pissarro.
